

No 2012 UFO Revelations? On to 2013!

Have any Predictions for 2013, NASA Secrets and the UFO Phenomenon?

The end of December is always an interesting time in Ufology. 2013 brings high expectations with its arrival. With elevated UFO Sightings, the end of 2012 will bring a higher awareness of the Paranormal and the Unknown. It's a time to reflect on the past, and then set that past firmly behind us where it belongs. In particular for Ufologists, UFO Field Investigators and even for Ufology Writers and Researchers, where I fit in, misunderstandings and mistakes make the search for Truth more difficult as the public becomes hyperaware of UFOs of the Paranormal.

As 2012 comes to an end, I find myself feeling a familiar feeling. About six months ago I had this dream four or five times, where I'd flown to Dream-Japan for a trip but discovered I lost my wallet along the way. (Which maybe symbolizes my concern for my finances or something?) I would suddenly have arrived across the great Ocean, with not a Yen to my name. I'd always lose my phone, so I couldn't call anyone back across the Pacific, and my dream self couldn't face the idea of asking strangers for help. Okay, to be honest, my dream self is never smart enough to remember to ask someone for help. That's not the scary part though.

Somewhere along the way the whole place (i.e. all of Japan, I suppose) would explode in Zombie-Outbreaks, and it's always by those really awful kind of Super Zombies - the kind that run rather than shamle forward in pieces. Full Disclosure: I hate zombies. I really hate them. Dead things really get to me, and I think it's because of the smell. The idea of these fast dead things running me down all so they could eat me, well...

...that doesn't put a smile on my face.

And that feeling I'd feel right at the moment before realizing I was dreaming, so before I knew that I was going to be okay after all, what would I call that very emotion?

Ah yes, I think I'd call it Dread.

As the owner of a couple UFO Blogs online, I have been fielding many questions all day and even night long about some strange things after I'd thought whatever had happened didn't happen, though I knew nothing was going to happen on December 21st. In looking over that last statement, I know how odd that sounded.

What I mean is: people are still a bit freaked out after last week's supposed Mayan Apocalypse. Polls taken rapidly went from 5% to 50% of Americans entertained the idea that the End of the World had arrived. I'm sure you can imagine that almost that number, perhaps even you, Dear Reader, believe that we live in the End Times. It has caused more people in the general population to start paying attention more to the more Paranormal aspects of life that occur everyday, all around them. Yes, there are a lot of unknown lights and such in the skies, as well as some mess of unknown vehicles constantly engaging the world's Air Forces all across the world. It's a very real phenomenon, and there's a sincere dearth of information forthcoming from Governments such as ours here in the United States.

I'll tell you what though: it's said that every generation of humankind always feels (or even yearns in some way) for our generation to be the one that sees the end. Eventually, one Generation of mankind will have it right. For the rest of us, let's live like we have a planet worth taking care of, focus on perhaps seeing what's out beyond our little world, and maybe we'll find we're not the ones who get to wave hello in person to (Insert Messiah of your Choice here).

New Science: Stealth Tech

Most of those are going to end up being the 21st Century versions of stealth tech. It's going to involve the hundreds of millions spent on light wrapping tech, aka cloaking. I'm looking forward to that announcement, after that technology is "old news" and they've moved on to the next generation of stealth. It's insidious though, the idea of vessels of our own nation and the other nation's of the world, flying above us, observing us without very much knowledge of such in the general population.

Loss of Privacy

It's going to be like the awareness that our telephone calls and texts (and perhaps emails) are generally filtered and observed by our National Security arm of the Government. We almost accept such as a normal fact of life now, don't we? That loss of privacy is a very sad, sad thing.

And yes, there are so many damn scammers out there - especially on YouTube*, that it's become very frustrating to decide what is real and what isn't real. They're not sure why they feel off kilter, and because I write on UFO 2013, Paranormal Phenomena and such, I'm supposed to be of help.

But I don't have any definitive answers, and that leads me to the most important part of this entire post: I'm asking for predictions for 2013. I had a couple messages asking me about this "big badass NASA revelation" coming up soon. So... I don't recall getting any memos from NASA as much as I love Space Exploration, I'm not an employee or anything, nor am a hacktivist anymore.

Not that I ever was to begin with.

But if such has been announced from the our nearby Space Gods, would someone mind sharing me a source, preferably from NASA? If there is an announcement, my guess is fossilized evidence of microscopic life on MARS. Just an educated guess, of course.

I don't expect the current version to NASA to yet admit that during its growth as an Institution of Science and Engineering it might have withheld a little evidence here and there.

a little... (sigh)

You see, I'm full of this sense of dread whenever my office home rings. Why? No, not because I'm the only man in my condo community with a landline - though I'm sure I'm only one of maybe two or three that do. But as the end of 2012 approaches, what makes me feel dreadful are the messages that are demanding my secret answers about the UFO Phenomenon because I'm either hoarding the information for my own empowerment or I'm being pressured by the Men in Black to keep the info to myself. Rest assured, so far neither is the case. I've only been immersing myself in the subject at a, shall we say, Pro Level in 2012, and while there have been some things that are pretty eyebrow raising, I suppose I have yet to find anything concrete enough to warrant any visits from anyone telling me to lay off.

Besides, the Men in Black won't have to track me down, when I'm getting my clock cleaned on my private phone number from a man accusing me of hoarding the knowlege followed by a demand to "the UFO stuff ou're keeping for yourself."

Yeah. That last one happened just as I was editing this blog to send. I just laughed at him. I might be keeping some of my opinions to myself while I'm still researching, especially when it comes to the past and present actions of one NASA.

Oh NASA - I love you, but are you still lying to me? Again?

So back to the emails, tweets and even calls to my private land line telephone: all communication attempts to find out what I surmise from my countless hours of research in to everything from the still hypothetical large objects at the edges of our solar system on to the searching with my emotions to see what my "spidey senses" think.

I kind of like the last one. That was kind of funny, as I explained I research to find data to support opinions, and with no supporting evidence, my gut instinct actually becomes a hindrance - at least if I'm to study the phenomenon scientifically.

So I am getting to a point here. And I mean this respectfully, and kindly, but firmly...

Please don't stalk Bloggers - especially those that delve in the Paranormal.

It gives us nightmares - the kind of nightmares with Super Zombies in them.

(shudder)

...if you enjoy a blog you read on a weekly or even daily basis: don't terrify the Blogger if you're not satisfied with details on a subject. Please remember that most blogs have contact pages, or at the very least they have comments below the posts, and you are encouraged to ask, tell, criticize or even (maybe?) praise a Blogger in those comments whenever you please. As far as the Phenomenon goes, the Holidays are a time when UFO Sightings are always elevated, though whether or not its a matter of more actual Phenomena or more people start to notice so more start looking, well that remains to be seen. Currently, UFO Sightings that are reported to MUFON[<] are elevated 12% over last month. (You can read those reports of first-hand eye-witness at UFO Sightings Today). If you notice that I haven't published my private numbers here to my blog, you'll probably understand why I might have been a little shocked to get those calls. The man told me he'd written twice on my the Facebook page of my website and had not heard from me yet.

To be clear, if you do in fact dig enough I suppose you can get anyone's private numbers. I'm not big on telephones. Anyone is welcome to contact me here on my site, or if you'd prefer a more direct route of communication - feel free to comment here or you can email me straight away if you'd prefer private conversation.

To those of you that have visited my site once and then actually have seen fit to return, I thank you sincerely. 2012 was a fun year of writing this blog and seeing it start to grow. It's going to be a bit hectic at the beginning of the year, as the site will be undergoing its full redesign into an actual Community for Paranormal Phenomena, an Application or two for iOS and Android and, as always, an attempt of one man in Atlanta, Georgia with far more questions than answers.

But I don't plan to stop asking those questions any time soon.

Thank you all for a great 2012. Here's to an even better 2013!

Sincerely

Robert Hughey - Contact Form.
